Event Description (About 250 Words): The Public Policy and Opinion Cell (PPOC), under the direction of the Knowledge and Development (K&D) heads, recently conducted a comprehensive workshop focused on “Mastering The Art of Guesstimates.” The primary objective of this session was to transform the way members approach complex, data-heavy questions by replacing "blind guessing" with a structured, logical framework.

The workshop introduced a step-by-step method for dismantling large, intimidating problems into smaller, manageable pieces. Participants were taught to start by clearly defining the boundaries of a question to ensure no effort was wasted. From there, they learned to build a "logic tree," a visual way of breaking a single unknown value such as the total number of meals served in a university canteen into simpler factors like the number of students, the percentage who eat on campus, and the average frequency of their visits.

A significant portion of the session focused on making “educated assumptions.” By using familiar reference points such as the approximate population of a city or the average size of an Indian household members learned how to fill in missing information confidently. Finally, the workshop emphasized the importance of a “sanity check,” teaching students to step back and evaluate whether their final answer aligned with real-world reality.
