YouTube channel Secret Base is best known for its Rewinder series, where it goes back to critical moments in sports history and contextualizes them with cool backdrop stories, like Sergio Aguero's last-minute PL-winning goal, Kyrie Irving's clutch championship-winning 3-pointer, and so on.

Early on in April 2019, SB came out with another Rewinder video. They decided to contextualise a pivotal moment in basketball, all the way back from 1995. It involved a massive comeback, a clutch moment that saved lives and prevented lifetime bonded slavery, and, lore has it, a break of hiatus.

What moment, that will be seeing a lot of revisits this year?

Regarding X's brief bizarre signature fashion statement, X said that it is his lucky charm.

"It has become my trademark. I like to be on stage and to entertain the audience." He likened it to Usain Bolt's trademark signature. While he did not sport the anxiety-inducing "trend" this year, he still ended up with lady luck on his side. Because of that, he also happened to be in the news for his exuberance for achieving a rare feat in his sport.

What trend was this? What rare feat?

The cinematography decisions for this movie were guided by certain fundamentals. The director wanted to capture the rawness and emotional sensitivity of the lead. A large part of the cinematic vision was also practical stunts, along with romance and escapism.

It was this combination of character drama and action that defined the visual strategy of the movie. So it was shot in a hand-held guerrilla style, along with the cinematographer's preference for long takes and intricate blocking. The vast color palette was decided by locations like Norway, Italy, Jamaica and London - contrasting between bright beaches and stark, tundra-like jungles.

This also led to this movie having a major cinematic first with respect to a storied history of movies that preceded it. What blockbuster is this, and what first does this movie have (surprisingly late for a movie of its scope)?
