Summary of report (covering modules)

The SLC 30: Public Policy and Governance program explored India's transition to clean cooking and sustainable energy through lectures, discussions, and case studies. Participants examined how health, environmental, and economic challenges created by reliance on traditional fuels like biomass and kerosene can be addressed through modern technologies such as induction cooking, electric pressure cookers, and solar-powered systems. The program highlighted the urgency of moving beyond imported LPG to electricity-based and renewable cooking solutions, emphasizing both efficiency and equity.

Technology and policy were seen as complementary drivers of change. Innovative appliances with higher efficiency and user-friendly designs were presented as viable alternatives, while financing mechanisms such as subsidies, concessional tariffs, micro-financing, and carbon credit integration were discussed as key enablers. Government schemes like the "Go Electric" campaign, PLI for solar manufacturing, and PM Surya Ghar Yojana were identified as critical to scaling adoption. Equally important were grassroots initiatives, especially women-led networks that combined appliance distribution, training, and awareness campaigns to build community trust and promote entrepreneurship.

The program concluded that India's clean cooking transition requires an integrated approach that combines technology, affordability, governance, and community engagement. Strengthening women-led service networks, investing in grid reliability, mandating efficiency standards, and institutionalizing long-term monitoring were recommended as crucial steps forward. With coordinated public-private action, India can reduce household emissions, safeguard health, and build resilient, sustainable energy systems aligned with its broader development goals.
